I am writing to you with deep concern about an important issue that deserves our attention and support. I'm referring to the protection of whales and the necessity of banning their hunting. I would like to share a few key facts to emphasize the importance of this matter. It's essential to note that the majority of Icelanders do not support whale hunting. Surveys show that many residents of Iceland hold whales in high regard and take pride in their presence. This is an indication that whale hunting is not a widely accepted or necessary practice in the country.

Furthermore, it's important to highlight that nearly all the meat obtained from whale hunting is sold in Japan. This underscores that whale hunting often has international repercussions and emphasizes the need for global intervention.

Whale hunting also has a negative impact on the reputation of the whales themselves. These magnificent marine creatures hold particular importance in the ocean's ecosystem and draw the attention of numerous environmental organizations and nature advocates. Continuing the hunting of whales undermines efforts to preserve their populations and well-being.

Based on these facts, I would like to express my support for the ban on whale hunting and call for joint efforts to protect these amazing marine beings. Our responsibility to nature and future generations requires us to take action for their preservation.
